I am trying to load a string into a variable so that I can then pass that variable to a function. I know that there are many different ways to do this, and I've included one of each below. Option 1 (Setting String in a Swift String) var str = "blahblahblah" func save(str: String) { print("str is \(str)") } Option 2 (Storing into an Array using Characters) var str = "blahblahblah" let chars = str.characters func save(chars: [Character]) { print("characters is \(chars)") } The issue I had with option one is that I couldn't seem to keep the string a String after it was saved into a variable. In order for the function to be properly called, I had to include a function parameter of type String, and after calling the function, I had to use the String() function to make it type String again. The second option worked as expected. Any help is appreciated, and thank you. A: In swift, Arrays are known as “structs” and they store value types using the type “[value type]”. The following is the type of the array of characters: '[Character]' The type of the string on the other hand is "String" 'String' In your first case, you are trying to convert a string to a array of characters. The array will just contain the characters of the string without a “type”. You
